Poetry

What is poetry? Who knows?

Not the rose, but the scent of the rose;

Not the sky, but the light in the sky;

Not the fly; but the gleam of the fly;

Not the sea; but the sound of the sea;

Not myself, but what makes me

See, hear, and feel something that prose

Cannot; and what it is who knows?

(Eleanor Farjeon, 1938)
In her poem, Poetry, Eleanor Farjeon used imagery, sensory details, repetition, and a series of metaphors to communicate her message. Her purpose was to define poetry, and in doing so, she engaged in a succinct form of writing to describe an elusive genre. Farjeon was not the first person to attempt such a definition.

Aristotle also tried to capture the essence of poetry. In Poetics (c. 335 BCE) Aristotle formed categories and organized various kinds of poetry into systems, identifying the “essential quality” of each (Telford, 1961, p. 1). His list of poetic forms included “Epic poetry and Tragedy, Comedy also and Dithyrambic poetry.”

As children, teenagers, and college students, many of us have experienced poetry as an approximation of Aristotle’s method: we categorized the types of poetry, conducted close analyses of the language in poetry, and discovered the aesthetic representations within the words (Figure 10.1). We memorized poems and we also read the great poets: Wordsworth, Yeats, Frost (Figure 10.2), Whitman, Poe, Keats, Shakespeare, Eliot, Thoreau.

In 5th grade, Sr. Margaret required my class to memorize and recite “The Charge of the Light Brigade” by Alfred Lloyd Tennyson. The poem is about the Battle of Balaclava during the Crimean War. Here is the first stanza.

Half a league half a league,
Half a league onward,
All in the valley of Death Rode the six hundred:
'Forward, the Light Brigade!
Charge for the guns' he said:
Into the valley of Death Rode the six hundred. - See more at:

I still remember the experience and I can recite some of the poem. Do you think that’s a good thing?
Here is one example.

To A Young Girl

My dear, my dear, I know

More than another

What makes your heart beat so;

Not even your own mother

Can know it as I know,

Who broke my heart for her

When the wild thought,

That she denies

And has forgot,

Set all her blood astir

And glittered in her eyes.

(William Butler Yeats, 1919)
If we were extra lucky, our teachers also introduced us to poetry by great women: Dickenson (Figure 10.3), Barrett Browning, Plath, Brontë.

These great poets were excellent wordsmiths. They crafted lyrical phrases about people, places, events, and feelings in ways that were uncommon. Their abilities to use precise, descriptive language gave readers new insight and an opportunity to re-see the world (Figure 10.4).

To evaluate descriptive books based primarily on the text, I use a combination of criteria from the NCTE Award for Excellence in Poetry for Children (ALA), the John Burroughs Riverby Award (American Museum of Natural History), and the Newbery Medal and Printz Award (ALA). Depending on the book, one or more of these criteria will apply:

- Perceptive and artistic accounts of direct experiences in the world
- Demonstrate authenticity of voice
- Use language and form in fresh ways
- Excellent, engaging, and distinctive use of clear and concise language.
- Excellent, engaging and distinctive use of vivid language.
- Excellent, engaging and distinctive use of sensory language.
- Appropriate structure to highlight the topic
- Appropriate organization with clear sequencing and logical development

If the description is presented in the form of a picturebook, I use the following criteria from the Caldecott Medal (ALA) as well.

- Excellence of execution in the artistic technique employed;
- Excellence of pictorial interpretation of theme or topic;
- Appropriateness of style of illustration to the theme or topic;
- Delineation of information through the pictures;
- Excellence of presentation in recognition of the intended audience.
How Do I Love Thee?

How do I love thee? Let me count the ways.

I love thee to the depth and breadth and height
My soul can reach, when feeling out of sight
For the ends of Being and ideal Grace.

I love thee to the level of every day's
Most quiet need, by sun and candlelight.

I love thee freely, as men strive for Right;
I love thee purely, as they turn from Praise.

I love with a passion put to use
In my old griefs, and with my childhood's faith.

I love thee with a love I seemed to lose
With my lost saints, I love thee with the breath,
Smiles, tears, of all my life! and, if God choose,

I shall but love thee better after death.

(Elizabeth Barrett Browning, 1850)
The women’s perspectives certainly added new twists to the content of poetry. In addition to writing about love and sexuality, female poets also wrote about injustice, death, and darker motifs (Figure 10.5). They tackled history and social issues alongside explorations of human existence. But their language and ways with words were not necessarily relatable to us—the youth who were required to read them.

Therefore, those of us who were super lucky may have been introduced to more accessible, but simultaneously more challenging, poets from different cultural, racial, and ethnic backgrounds: Hughes (Figure 10.6), Angelou, Wheatley, Brooks, McKay, Clifton, Cisneros, Soto, Neruda, Marti, Mora, Harjo.

By reading poetry from diverse poets, we could see how difficult topics were tackled differently. Poetic language changed. The sensibilities and diction of Victorian England or 19th Century New England gave way to urban, immigrant, disenfranchised, powerful, and hopeful voices who intended to describe and persuade.

For example, in Harriet, Lucille Clifton challenges poetic and descriptive traditions with her content (celebrating strong Black women at the height of the Civil Rights movement), her language (using Black English vernacular to create the sounds of speech), and conventions (using lower case letters throughout to create the informal feeling of a private note or journal entry).

Modern poets may be more relatable to modern audiences (Figure 10.7), but not necessarily to young audiences. I’m certainly not one to prohibit youth from reading adult poetry; however, there is something missing from adult poetry that children need—the experiences and perspectives of youth.
Those of you who are lottery lucky know what I mean. You have read poetry written specifically for children and adolescents: Silverstein, Prelutsky, Greenfield, Ciardi, Grimes, Adoff, Fisher, McCord, Merriam, Kuskin, Worth, Kennedy, Florian (Figure 10.8).

To evaluate argumentation based primarily on the text, I use a combination of criteria from awards designed to address a point of view or perspective [e.g., Jane Addams Peace Award (http://www.janeaddamspeace.org/jacba/subguide.shtml), Scott O’Dell Award for Historical Fiction (http://www.scottodell.com/pages/scotto’dellawardforhistoricalfiction.aspx), Sibert Medal (http://www.ala.org/alsc/awardsgrants/bookmedia/sibertmedal/sibertterms/sibertmedaltrms) and the Orbis Pictus Award (http://www.ncte.org/awards/orbispictus)].

- Depending on the book, one or more of these criteria apply:
  - Establishes a central claim;
  - Provides clear and accurate evidence to support the claim;
  - Appropriate organization with clear sequencing and logical development;
  - Appropriate style of presentation for subject and for intended audience;
  - Honest and intimate accounts of experience that are relevant.

If the argumentation is presented in the form of a picture book, or if it includes sufficient illustration, I use the following criteria from the Caldecott Medal as well (http://www.ala.org/alsc/awardsgrants/bookmedia/caldecottmedal/caldecottterms/caldecottterms).

- Excellence of execution in the artistic technique employed;
- Excellence of pictorial interpretation of theme or argument;
- Appropriateness of style of illustration to the theme or argument;
- Delineation of argument through the pictures;
- Excellence of presentation in recognition of the intended audience.
How To Eat A Poem

Don't be polite.

Bite in.

Pick it up with your fingers and lick the juice that may run down your chin.

It is ready and ripe now, whenever you are.

You do not need a knife or fork or spoon or plate or napkin or tablecloth.

For there is no core or stem or rind or pit or seed or skin to throw away.

(Eve Merriam, 1964)
Just because poetry is written for children does not mean it will be fluffy and light. In Eve Merriam’s poem, How To Eat a Poem, she doesn’t condescend to readers with simplistic language or forced rhyme. She describes poetry through a metaphor that is easily relatable (eating) but also quite deep—a poem leaves nothing to throw away. She also portrays poetry as delicious, sloppy, and ill-mannered, sending readers the message that youthful interactions are encouraged.

The content of children’s poetry spans the gamut of human experience—just like adult poetry. Also, the language of children’s poetry varies depending on the intended audience. Poetry for young children (Figure 10.9) is different than poetry for older children (Figure 10.10); and poetry for older children is different than poetry for adolescents (Figure 10.11).

In US schools and universities, there is always the temptation to continue a structural approach to poetry. Analysis is familiar. Close reading is scholarly. Familiarity is the reason why the general public calls for a return “back to basics.” Identifying the mechanics of a poem is one way people make sense of poetry. However, the elaboration, sensory detail, and descriptive language of poetry creates spaces for different ways to find meaning. I like to go into those spaces.

In this chapter, I explore who’s writing poetic texts looking specifically at the content of poetry and examining texts that describe, persuade, and elicit embodied ways of reading.
Who’s Who?

When searching for lists of “best” poetry or the “top ten poets” of all time, why do the search results look like a collection from the Dead Poet’s Society (Schulman, 1988)? Try to find a good list of recommended poets or poems and the lists are more classic than contemporary.

Here is a list of 30 Great Poems Everyone Should Know:
http://www.thetimes.co.uk/tto/public/poetrycompetition/article3229711.ece

These poems come from poets who qualify for membership in the “Dead Poets Society.” However, if you watch the film, the teacher, Mr. Keating (played by the late Robin Williams), challenges the orthodox, academic view on poetry:

“We don’t read and write poetry because it’s cute. We read and write poetry because we are members of the human race. And the human race is filled with passion. Medicine, law, business, engineering, these are all noble pursuits, and necessary to sustain life. But poetry, beauty, romance, love, these are what we stay alive for.”

Then Mr. Keating lowers his voice and paraphrases Walt Whitman’s poem, reciting:

"O me, o life of the questions of these recurring, of the endless trains of the faithless, of cities filled with the foolish. What good amid these, o me, o life. Answer: that you are here. That life exists, and identity. That the powerful play goes on, and you may contribute a verse...” Then the Mr. Keating stops for a brief moment, looks at his students and asks,

“What will your verse be?”

(Haft, et. al., 2006, Touchstone Home Entertainment).

If you want to find a strong selection of poetry, you have to visit a public library or independent bookstore. Or you have to know specific titles and poets. Most adults’ unfamiliarity with modern poetry creates a perpetual void in what is offered to youth. If parents, librarians, and teachers do not read or value poetry, then children are not exposed to poetry. In addition, I am frequently dismayed by the utter lack of poetry in major bookstores and retailers. In major retailers you will only find the most popular books based on sales history or holiday themes. It’s true. Look for yourself.
The Popular Ones: Shel Silverstein, Jack Prelutsky

Award for Most Popular

Without question, Shel Silverstein is the most well-known and beloved poet for children (Figure 10.12). Here’s why:

Shel Silverstein wrote poetry that entertains. Watch him:
(https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Bv2LUva-f0)

Shel Silverstein wrote poetry that is relatable. Read Sick
(https://www.poets.org/poetsorg/poem/sick).

Shel Silverstein wrote poetry that is meaningful. Read The Little Boy and the Old Man

Shel Silverstein wrote poetry that sounds good (Figure 10.13).

Shel Silverstein did not condescend to children. Although some librarians and teachers critique his poetry as simplistic (e.g., Kutiper & Wilson, 1993), he actually wrote from a playful, ironic, truthful place. Shel Silverstein understood what children wanted and needed in a poem.

Plus, listen to him read
(https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=CNiaYHZme_U). He knows how language works.
Award for Funniest

Jack Prelutsky shares similar qualities with Shel Silverstein.

Jack Prelutsky writes poetry that entertains. Watch this (https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=nVJX845OLuA).

Jack Prelutsky writes poetry that is meaningful (Figure 10.14).

Jack Prelutsky writes poetry that sounds good. Read here: (http://jackprelutsky.com/jacks-poems/).

I love the poetry of Jack Prelutsky. Poetry doesn’t need iambic pentameter or linguistic metaphors to impress me (although Jack has both). Prelutsky’s poetry is mostly humorous; and who doesn’t like humor? Plus, children and young adults love it (Figure 10.15).
When selecting poetry for children, the popular poets, such as Jack Prelutsky and Shel Silverstein, are a great place to start. Why? Youth are drawn to their humor.

Way back in 1974, Ann Terry surveyed 422 students in 4th, 5th, and 6th grade to determine their poetry preferences. She found that the students liked contemporary poems with humorous content, familiar experiences, and animals (Sounds about right!). The students also preferred narrative poems and poems with rhythm and rhyme (Yes, they sound better). Students disliked the poems they couldn’t understand (Who doesn’t?) and they disliked poems with visual imagery and figurative language (I get it).

Follow-up studies in the early 1990s supported Ann Terry’s research. Kutiper and Wilson (1993) examined surveys of students in different grade levels and they also examined research using circulation records to determine what books students checked out of the library. The students consistently preferred rhythm, rhyme, excitement, and humor.

Recently, Jonda McNair (2012) found some expansion in children’s interest in poetic forms (e.g., children enjoyed free verse), but the content of poetry preferences still holds true: youth like humorous, familiar, and rhythmic poetry. For these reasons, and many more, Uncle Shelby and Jackie P. are two of children’s most loved poets.

Hmm, contemporary topics, familiar experiences, humor. Sounds like a perfect description of “Charge of the Light Brigade.” (Are you detecting my sarcasm?)

The Award Winners

In previous chapters, I debated the value of using awards to determine the quality of a book. Awards have their issues, but they also have some benefits. In the case of poetry, given its limited availability in bookstores, award winners are helpful guides that can direct your attention to the good stuff.
The National Council of Teachers of English offers the Award for Excellence in Poetry for Children. This award was created in 1977 to honor a living American poet for his or her aggregate work for children ages 3-13. The award is given to a poet or anthologist (someone who creates poetry collections) for his or her literary merit, contributions, and appeal to children.

Literary Merit (art and craft of aggregate work--as poet or anthologist)
Creating books of poetry that demonstrate imagination, authenticity of voice, evidence of a strong persona, and universality / timelessness are essential. In short, we're looking for a poet who creates poetry books that contain clean, spare lines; use language and form in fresh ways; surprise the reader by using syntax artistically; excite the reader's imagination with keen perceptions and sharp images; touch the reader's emotions. A maker of word events is what we're looking for.

Appeal to Children
Although the appeal to children of a poet's or anthologist's work is an important consideration, the art and craft must be the primary criterion for evaluation. Evidence of students' excitement for the poetry and evidence of childlike quality, yet poem's potential for stirring fresh insights and feelings should be apparent.

http://www.ncte.org/awards/poetry

The poets who won this award are among the who’s who in children’s poetry. Below, I listed the year they won the award and links to their collections via Goodreads.com (if available). Goodreads is a quick way to scan through most of their books.

- David McCord, 1977 (Figure 10.16) (http://www.goodreads.com/author/show/6883654.David_T_W_McCord)

- Karla Kuskin, 1979 (http://www.goodreads.com/search?utf8=%E2%9C%93&query=karla+kuskin&search_type=books)

As a child, I always wondered about love. What is love? How do you know when you are in love? (Figure 10.17). In these poems, Eloise Greenfield uses very small moments from normal, everyday life, to show children what love means, how it feels, and how someone-who-loves acts.

Love Don’t Mean

Love don’t mean all that kissing
Like on television
Love means Daddy
Saying keep your mama company
till I get back
And me doing it.

Keepsake

Before Mrs. Williams died
She told Mr. Williams
When he gets home
To get a nickel out of her
Navy blue pocket book
And give it to her
Sweet little gingerbread girl
That’s me
I ain’t never going to spend it

The NCTE Award winners are not an exhaustive list of poets; but the list provides a good resource for exploration.

Another place to find award-winning poets is the list of Poet Laureates (http://www.loc.gov/poetry/laureate-2011-present.html). The Poet Laureate is a consultant in poetry to the Library of Congress. The poet is appointed for a year term and the person is responsible for raising “the national consciousness to a greater appreciation of the reading and writing of poetry” (http://www.loc.gov/poetry/about_laureate.html). The selected poets initiate special projects (e.g., Poetry 180 http://www.loc.gov/poetry/180/) and engage in talks, readings, and dramatic performances. Of course, the Poet Laureates write poetry for adults, but many of them also write poetry for youth. In addition, the line between youth and adults is a blurry one. If the poetry inspires and interests you, it might do the same for children and young adults.
There is no official Children’s Poet Laureate for the Library of Congress. However, The Poetry Foundation awards the Young People’s Poet Laureate title every two years (http://www.poetryfoundation.org/resources/poet-laureate/). The award recognizes poets who write for children and youth, and it attempts to raise awareness and promote poetry for young people.

The Weirdos, Novelties, and Outliers

Between Shel, Jack, and the award winners, I’ve mentioned some of the big names in poetry for children. But there are many more. There are poets for every single taste and interest—every sense and sensibility.

Just for the fun of it, I categorized my favorite poets by their content. They are the weirdos, novelties, and outliers. I assign these labels with great affection. These poets have carved out poetry niches and they have moved the sound and look of poetry in new directions.

The Weirdos. The Weirdos are the poets who often write about scary, dark, and mysterious events. They may refer to a monster or two, including those that are imagined and real.

Roald Dahl (Figure 10.19)
Jack Prelutsky
Marilyn Singer
Christine Heppermann
Edgar Allan Poe
Liz Rosenberg

If you love scary, there is a website for scary poetry for children (http://www.scaryforkids.com/scary-poems/). If you can get past the ads and design, the poetry is good.

Poetry Soup also sorts poetry by scary type (http://www.poetrysoup.com/poems/horror).
The Novelties. The Novelty poets are interesting and charming. They pursue their own topic strands and establish lines of poetry about school, lunchrooms, siblings, body functions, etc. They are the serial poets.

- Bruce Lansky
- Alison Lester
- Dennis Lee
- Natalie Finnigan
- C.J. Heck
- Kenn Nesbitt (Figure 10.20)
- Brod Bagert

Kenn Nesbitt created a website where users can search for poems by category and reading level. The website also includes games, apps, word lists, and videos (http://www.poetry4kids.com).

The Outliers. The Outliers are the poets who are unconventional. They are the poets who think with poetry and challenge the status quo. They write about social justice, food justice, and the environment. They explore our ways of being.

- Paul Fleischman
- Douglas Florian
- Jacqueline Woodson
- X.J. Kennedy
- Paul Janeczko
- Judith Viorst
- Joyce Sidman
- Naomi Shihab Nye (Figure 10.21)

Jacqueline Woodson is the Young People’s Poet Laureate from 2015-2017. Her website includes samples of poetry as memoir, poetry as fiction, poetry as picture book, poetry as history, and poetry as empathy (http://www.jacquelinewoodson.com/books-ive-written/poetry/).
Whether popular, award-winning, or weird, poetry can be used to describe, inform, persuade, and tell stories. Poets describe human emotions and experiences, pushing readers toward new ways of thinking.

Finding Poetry

Quite honestly, poets are difficult to categorize and they rarely focus all of their writing efforts on one theme or a single form of poetry. For this reason poetry is often assembled into anthologies, featuring the work of many people.

- Anthologies are collections of poetry.
  - Single-authored anthologies are collections of poetry by one poet (Figure 10.22).
  - Edited anthologies are collections of poetry by many different poets and an editor makes the selection of which poets and what poems to include in the collection (Figure 10.23).
  - Picture books are also used to showcase poetry collections (Figure 10.24).
- Single poems can be segmented to span the length of a picture book.
- Picture books are often used to showcase an illustrator’s interpretation of poetry.
- Entire novels can be written in verse, with or without illustration (Figure 10.25).

Children's poetry comes in all shapes, sizes, and formats to cover any topic (Video 10.1). There are many poetry websites that make it easy to find poets and their poetry.

Sharing Poetry

With an understanding of who writes poetry, let’s take a look at how to read and share poetry for children and youth.

Poetry Is Not A Math Problem

Poetry should NOT be
Structurally dissected
Linguistically torn apart
Or quantifiably syllabified
Without a focus on enjoyment, engagement, and reading.

Poetry should not be
Forcibly
Memorized
Or contrived to fit some outdated conception of literariness.

Children's poetry should be READ ALOUD!

Experienced.
Savored.
Acted upon.
Reading Aloud and Recitations

Poetry readings are not a new concept. Poetry is best experienced when it is read aloud.

Poetic language is intended for savoring, enunciating, stretching, and emphasizing.

Reading aloud entertains children, youth, and adults.

Reading a shared text gives the group a central focus and a cohesive focal point.

Reading aloud elicits conversations and further insight about the poem.

Reading aloud helps children learn how to read (this is really true). They develop an ear for poetry, language, and words.

I couldn’t understand Shakespeare until my high school English teacher read it out loud. Listen to Shel Silverstein, Maya Angelou, and Langston Hughes read their poems. Their reading techniques add to my comprehension of their messages.

The web exhibit, Poetry Through The Ages, provides excellent suggestions for reading aloud (http://www.webexhibits.org/poetry/home_reading.html). The exhibit also explains the basic measurements of poetic forms (e.g., hexameter, pentameter, etc.) and the most common types of meter used. In addition, the exhibit outlines tools for reading poetry.

Reading poetry is so important the Library of Congress developed Poetry 180 (http://www.loc.gov/poetry/180/), a resource intended to help high school students read a poem a day during the school year. Hosted by Billy Collins, U.S. Poet Laureate from 2001-2003, Poetry 180 includes a list of 180 poems (one for each school day), ideas for ways to share the poems, and helpful hints for how to read a poem effectively.

Read the poem slowly.
Read in a normal, relaxed tone.
Pause only where there is punctuation, not at the end of every line.
Know what the poem means so the message is communicated (From http://www.loc.gov/poetry/180/p180-howtoread.html).
For those who like competition, Poetry Out Loud is a national competition sponsored by the National Endowment for the Arts and the Poetry Foundation (http://www.poetryoutloud.org). The official contest is for high school students in participating states, but the poetry and materials are free for anyone to use. Poetry Out Loud also offers tips for reading and video examples of voice, physical presence, and dramatic appropriateness (http://www.poetryoutloud.org/poems-and-performance/tips-on-reciting).

Choral Reading

Choral reading or speaking is a term that describes an oral performance in which two or more people read or speak as one voice. Choral reading or speaking requires the performers to read for fluency and listen to the nuances of written language. In other words, through performance, the reader attends to the descriptive and structural elements of the text. Paul Fleischman created books of poetry for two voices (Figure 10.26) and four voices (Figure 10.27).

There are no specific criteria for selecting a text to read chorally. Instead, let the text determine the choral speaking method. Although poetry is perfect for choral speaking, not all poems are suitable for it. Choose your text carefully. Use the following general descriptions as a basis for your decisions.

Before you begin, read the poem once or twice to hear the flow of the language and understand the poem’s meaning. Then use Poetry 180 for tips for reading effectively (From http://www.loc.gov/poetry/180/p180-howtoread.html).
Refrain. Choose a text in which the refrain repeats and is important. Typically, a selected person reads most of the lines while other participants read lines or stanzas that repeat. Here is an example (Video 10.2).

Video 10.2 IGNTE Choral Reading:Speak FIRST Chapter https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Cp-VTHGJKWA

Line a person/group. Choose a text in which different voices need to be heard. Divide the text into segments (e.g., lines, stanzas, refrains). Individuals or small groups are assigned to read one segment. Each person reads only his or her segment. You may also assign small groups to read one segment. Here is an example (Video 10.3).

Video 10.3 Choral Reading Example https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=LFRzl2Oe_Bs
Here is another one (Video 10.4).

Video 10.4 Changing the World, One Word at a Time! https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=YshUDa10JYY

Cumulative. Choose a text in which the message builds or circles around concepts or phrases. Divide the poem into segments and assign to a person/group. The first reader begins and then others join in when it is their turn. Everyone reads his or her segment and continues reading until the end of the poem. Here is an example (Video 10.5).

Video 10.5 Old Lady Who Swallowed A Fly https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=qC_xO2aN_IA
Here is another one (Video 10.6).

Video 10.6 Three Michael McDonalds Sing "Row, Row, Row Your Boat"
https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=JeCD4bIkQwg

Antiphonal. Select a text in which the message is emphasized by different voices, tones, and sounds. Divide the text into segments and determine the “voice” for each segment (Ex. high-low, soft-loud, squeaky-strong, male-female, etc.). Then divide the group to read their corresponding parts. Here is an example (Video 10.7).

Video 10.7 IGNTE Choral Reading: 4th Chapter https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=gbtMDrx59JY
Unison. Choose a text that feels communal and more powerful when read by many voices. To me, unison reading is the most difficult type of choral speaking because the entire group reads the poem at one time. It takes practice to get many voices reading at the same time. Here is an example (Video 10.8).

Poetry Slams and Spoken Word

Poetry Slams are performance opportunities for individuals or teams of poets to present their work on stage. Audience members and/or a panel of judges rate the performance and select winners. Poetry Slams are live events, but slams can also occur via social networks (https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=lpPASWlnZIA) and curated collections such as TED talks (https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=cxGWGohIXiw).

Watch this Ted Talk about writing slam poetry.

Youth Speaks (http://youthspeaks.org/) is an organization that produces local and national youth poetry slams, festivals, and reading events, as well as arts-education programming.

Spoken Word poetry is similar to a Poetry Slam in that the poetry is performed in front of an audience. However, there is no winner or contest. The Power Poetry website provides advice for writing and performing Spoken Word poetry (http://www.powerpoetry.org/actions/5-tips-spoken-word).

Performing and Embodying Poetry

In addition to sharing poetry through recitation and poetry slams, poetry is also a source for embodied performance. Poetic texts elicit different responses and emotions. To act on those responses, readers often use arts-based modalities as a way of understanding. In particular, performing arts allow readers to use their voices and body movements to convey their interpretations.

Dramatic interpretation. Dramatic engagement can take many forms, from a scripted play to an improvised scene. Poetic texts can serve as the foundation for dramatic performances or as the basis for informal theater games. For example, tableaux are frozen scenes created by participants’ bodies, gestures, and facial expressions. Tableau can be used as a form of illustration as readers enact scenes with their bodies. Tableau also provides a structure in which the participants can explore characters, emotions, and roles from within the text (See Figures 10.28 and 10.29).
Musical interpretation. Musical performance is another medium for reading and sharing poetry because the poetry can be rhythmically, linguistically, and vocally interpreted. Many people equate song lyrics with poetry, but there may be more intricate connections with regard to content and sound (Figure 10.30). Musical instruments, including the voice, can be explored in relation to the rhythm, tone, and cadence of a poem. Watch this video for an excellent example of musical interpretation of poetry (Video 10.9).

When a poet is also an illustrator, really cool things can happen between image and text. For example, Douglas Florian uses art to understand celestial objects and find just-right words to describe them. Visual interpretation. If you explore children’s poetry, you will discover that most publications contain visual elements, pictures, or nontraditional uses of typeface and layout. Consequently, many poems published for children are visual poems or presented in a form of a picture book in which images and text are equally important and interrelated (Figure 10.31).

Although visual responses such as drawing, painting, or photography, are not typically considered to be performing arts, the act of creating images is an embodied experience. In creating an image the reader can reveal his or her understanding of the text. Altering different media (crayons, markers, paint, chalk, photographs) have an impact on comprehension and interpretation as well (Video 10.10).

As Nikki Giovanni states in her introduction, Hip Hop is modern opera, with truthful tales surrounded by public commentary. This collection of poetry includes celebrated children’s poets, musicians, and rappers telling stories. Hip Hop Speaks to Children: A Celebration of Poetry with a Beat selected by Nikki Giovanni and illustrated by Michele Noiset and Jeremy Tugeau, 2008, Naperville, IL: Sourcebooks. Creating Poetry by Csaba Osvath

In children’s poetry, there are poets who construct visual or concrete poetry by creating visual compositions where the text and visual elements (e.g., pictures, typeface, colors, layout, balance) are inseparable. A famous example is Lewis Carroll’s ‘Mouse’s Tale’ in Alice’s Adventures in Wonderland, where the text is shaped as a long, curving tail (Figure 10.32).

Another type of visual poetry is graphic poetry, where images are intentionally matched with a text to aid comprehension and interpretation. In the production of filmed, spoken-word poetry, many poets will augment their recitation with images and words to enhance the experience of engaging with their poems on the screen. As such, visual and concrete poems offer layers of interaction with the reader (Figure 10.33). By creating visual, graphic, or concrete poems the poet offers new approaches to communicate or to connect with the audience.

Poetry: A Slippery Slide. Of course, as a mature person, you might think that your beliefs about poetry are irrelevant in the context of poetry in an academic course in children’s literature. Additionally, you might think that learning about poetry related to children’s literature has little connection to your “adult” life and the problems related to adulthood. However, consider Lemony Snicket’s introduction to a children’s poetry portfolio, ‘All Good Slides Are Slippery’, in Poetry magazine where he wrote:

The poems contained in this children’s poetry portfolio are not made for children. Poetry is like a curvy slide in a playground – an odd object, available to the public – and, as I keep explaining to my local police force, everyone should be able to use it, not just those of a certain age (See more at http://www.poetryfoundation.org/poetrymagazine/article/246328).
I personally agree with Snicket. Poetry is a kind of functional architecture or a transportation device that is asking us to inhabit it and to use it with the added possibility of joy, thrill, or even fear. Snicket does not mention the intellectual abilities of children when it comes to poetry. He never writes that these poems are too complex, or too difficult, or too challenging for a young audience. He suggests that understanding might not even be a necessary prerequisite for engaging with poetry. In fact, even if you don’t understand what the author meant to say, the poem still communicates to you. The poem can still reach you and impact your life, incite and ignite feelings, reveal ideas, etc. Consider, the short poem from the portfolio by Eileen Myles, titled “Uppity” (http://www.poetryfoundation.org/poetrymagazine/poem/246366).

Uppity

Roads around mountains

cause we can’t drive

through

That’s Poetry

to Me.

(Eileen Myles, 2013)

What does the poet mean in this poem? Are the roads a metaphor for words? Or are the roads a metaphor for contemplation? Is there a point to explain this poem, or is the experience of reading the poem, simply, meaningful? Again, Snicket hits the mark when he writes about the essence of poetry in the context of a children’s literature:

If you are a child, you might like these poems. Of course, you might not. Poems, like children, are individuals, and will not be liked by every single person who happens to come across them. So you may consider this portfolio a gathering of people in a room. It does not matter how old they are, or how old you are yourself. What matters is that there are a bunch of people standing around in a room, and you might want to look at them.
Ars Poetica. All this leads to some important conclusions. Poetry is communal, regardless of the age or the “maturity” of its audience. Poetry does not function in isolation. Poetry thrives on interpersonal connections and on the use of voice and speech. Poetry thrives when it is “said out loud” and heard by “a bunch of peoples standing around.” So the questions loop back around and pose questions that answer, “What do you believe about poetry?” “Do you need poetry in your life?” And most importantly, “What can poetry offer you?”

When I now ponder these questions, I recall the story of a young boy, Gregory Orr, who is now a college professor of English. Through a project organized by National Public Radio (NPR) he tells a poignant, but inspiring story about a tragic childhood accident in his life and the role of poetry. Orr goes as far as to elevate poetry and the writing of poems as tools for survival. Orr reveals that for him, poetry and the making of poems are a “way of surviving the emotional chaos, spiritual confusion, and traumatic events that come with being alive” (http://www.npr.org/templates/story/story.php?storyId=5221496). The author shares how traumatic violence isolates us and makes us numb. For him, the act of writing and actively sharing poetry with others became the essential tool to process his painful experiences and translate them into words. And when we are able to translate experiences into words, we realize that we are no longer powerless. Instead, we can actively shape our memories and our pain into poems. And through the act of sharing, we realize that we are no longer alone. We are, indeed, part of humanity.

Exploring Poetry

The work of the great poets often serve as our introduction to poetry, but irrelevant teaching practices may have taken many of us away. Take a look at poetry for children and young adults. Revisit the classics and modern adult poetry as well. But do so by creating embodied experiences, reading aloud, and playing with the words, shapes, and meaning of poetry. Bottom line: you will find new meaning.

Sharing great poetry with children is not only a catalyst of change, but it is a valuable and diverse tool that poets (even emergent or amateur ones) can master and utilize in order to express their feelings, ideas, thoughts, dreams. Poetry allows us to connect with others, which eliminates fear from the “other.” The key or the foundation for this responsibility begins with our willingness to engage with and to learn about poetry that is written, created, spoken, and intended for children or youth.
